

Awakening of the Everglades

By Joy Kime Benton

I am the land of tomorrow . . . long have my lips been dumb,
Long have I hoarded and waited, but now I welcome you—come!
Come, all you strong ones and hopeful, wide
am I swinging my doors; Listen! . . . I'm calling you, pleading; come win what you want . . . it is yours!

Alone in the smiling sunshine a million years
and a day,
I have gathered, gathered, gathered with
never a debt to pay.
My soil is teeming with treasures, richer than
lands of the Nile,
My skies are as hot as passion; as soft as a baby's smile.

To some I am outcast, pariah, a land of
mirages and lies;
A miasmic marsh of mosquitoes, a fen of
fever and flies;
But these are the weaklings, the wastrels,
with never a dream to their name,
While I am asking for red blood and sinews
to mould my fame.

Men who will tackle barehanded and drive
from my borders each pest;
Men who will cherish and love me, not idlers to merely invest;
But builders who vision the future; vikings
who venture and win,
These will I take to my bosom . . . for these
are my favored kin.

Expectant here in the sunshine I feel that
my time is near;
I want to give birth to fair cities, to gardens
with never a peer;
I want to hear singing and laughter . . .
motherly voices and sweet,
I want to see rollicking babies and feel their pattering feet.

I am the land of tomorrow . . . tomorrow will soon be today;
My hands are stretched out to the hardy, I'm bidding you heed what I say.
Come, all you strong ones and hopeful, enter
my wide swinging doors;
Listen! . . . I'm calling you, pleading, com
win what you want . . . it is yours!
